

OBAMA'S WASHINGTON

Political leadership in a partisan era

Edited by Clodagh Harrington

This volume contains a vibrant set of insightful essays which examine the array of challenges facing the Obama administration, and the president himself. Topics range from how best to manage a ruptured economy to controlling the budget, the green agenda, foreign policy and the recalibration of US relations with the UK, along with sections on presidential leadership, elections, healthcare and food poverty. The common theme throughout is the issue of governing in a fractured, fractious political environment, and the difficulties that accompany this. Contributing scholars are based at both US and UK academic institutions, and so a range of informed perspectives are offered throughout this engaging work. Packed with detail and yet highly accessible, this volume will appeal to those interested in American politics, history and the political process.

“Harrington and her colleagues have brought fresh eyes and analytic heft to the issues facing Americans and their government. Theoretically grounded and substantively sound – with a refreshing emphasis on policy rather than personality – this volume is an essential starting point for those researching, or just remembering, the Obama administration and its efforts to shape history.

Andrew Rudalevige, Thomas Brackett Reed Professor of Government, Bowdoin College, Maine

“In this very well-edited volume, Clodagh Harrington assembles a team of eminent contributors from both sides of the Atlantic to provide an informative, insightful and important analysis of American political leadership in the current era of partisan polarization. Their fluent and accessible contributions are up to date and on the mark. This is a book that deserves a wide readership, in both the United States and Europe.

Iwan Morgan, Professor of US Studies and Head of US Programmes at the Institute of the Americas, University College London
